SHRINKING MAN STOPS DECLINE, GAINS WEIGHT

Removal of Overworking Glands Brings Real Joy to Victim

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Aug. 4.—(AP)—Hans Nelson, the "shrinking man," smiled over an operation he said has put him "on top of the world."

Two years ago surgeons removed half of his parathyroid glands in an effort to stop destification of his bones which took 10 inches off his height in five years. Nelson had been shrinking for 15 years until he was a stooped man of five feet.

Auto Trips

"As far as my life was concerned," Nelson said, "I figured I was gone. I made a try though, and I'm glad of it."

He said he had taken 200 and 300-mile automobile trips this summer, doing the driving himself. His back still is too weak to support his body in strenuous work, but he said driving a car is "perfect" because he gets good support.

Off his earlier calcium diet, Nelson now eats anything. Dr. Richard Johnson at University of Minnesota hospital, who handled the case, insists on a quart of milk a day and lots of vitamins A and D to promote bone growth.

Bone Softening

Dr. Johnson said last week he was convinced Nelson's case was an example of osteo-malacia, or softening of the bone, and not solely hyperparathyroidism. The symptoms are sometimes identical, he said, but there was no tumor found in Nelson as is present in most cases of hyperparathyroidism.

"The parathyroid glands control mineralization of the bones. Overactive, they can drain the bones and carry it away in the blood stream, sometimes depositing it in other organs where it "petrifies" them.

"This has been a wonderful thing for me." Nelson said of the treatments, "and I have been very happy about the way it has helped other people all over the world."

He said doctors had written him from as far away as South Africa to learn of the treatment. One woman in Africa was helped, as he was, Nelson said, by a diagnosis made by her doctor through the mails.

Nelson, now standing five feet even as he did at the time of the operation, says he is gaining strength "every day" and looks for the time when he will be even more active.

INSECT EXHIBIT GETS ATTENTION

COLUMBUS, O., Aug. 4.—(AP)—Insects vied for attention today in the natural history collection of the Ohio State museum here.

The exhibit ranged from a praying grasshopper to a ferocious looking caterpillar. Curator Edward S. Thomas said that more specimens would be added later.

The Chinese mantis, sometimes known as the "praying mantis," is getting the most attention. Thomas said that "praying" would better describe the insect.

It was brought to the United States from China and is considered beneficial to this country because it kills many destructive insects.

The caterpillar is of the cerropia class and although it is formidable looking, it really is helpless.

Then there's the walking sticks, so named because of the insect's resemblance to sticks. It is a member of the grasshopper family.

MANY MARRIAGES IN OTTAWA COUNTY

PORT CLINTON, Aug. 4.—According to the records of the probate court of Ottawa county July was a big month for marriage licenses with 26 licenses having been granted, which exceeded June with 19 licenses. In July last year only eight licenses were issued. The total number for the first seven months of this year was 103 while 105 were issued during the same period last year.

PUBLIC SALE ADDS TO MEMORIAL FUND

PORT CLINTON, Aug. 4.—A public sale was held at the home of the late H. B. Magruder on Washington street, when the personal property of Mr. Magruder was disposed, and the proceeds will be added to the Memorial hospital fund which had been created by Mr. Magruder prior to his death. The two story brick home will also be disposed of by the trustees of the hospital fund. The trustees recently secured a six months option on the Mrs. George Sloan property on Fulton street, where it is expected the hospital will be erected. The present home of Mrs. Sloan may be used for a home for nurses if the hospital is located at this property which contains 20 acres.

MEN ON RELIEF TO CUT GRASS

It is Either Work or Have No Assistance for Employables

COLUMBUS, O., August 4.—(AP)—Mayor Myron B. Gessaman ordered that all able-bodied men on the city's relief rolls be put to work on public jobs, such as cutting grass.

Those employed will be credited with wages equaling 30 cents an hour and will be required to labor until their semi-monthly relief check has been "earned."

William H. Hartsough, Jr., city relief director, said he did not know how many of the 8,500 persons receiving relief could be classed as employables.

Mayor Gessaman also ordered that the number on relief be reduced 20 per cent by August 16.

Never before in human history has the world been so regimented in its activities.

Mary Barrett, ambitious to become a dress designer, is in Paris where she has just obtained a job with Countess Ania Sawska, famous Polish dress artist. She had been recommended to her by Mark Sutherland, American playboy and mutual friend who admired Mary from the first following their meeting on shipboard. Mary likes Mark but resents his attitude toward her as a smart New York shop-girl. Another girl, after several months of devotion, dumps Charlie's shoe suddenly, disillusioned, after an alternation with Tony's head boyce, Francine Long, and exiled for Paris impulsively. Mope and more she realizes she is in love with Tony. (NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY)

CHAPTER 13

IN LATE September Mark Sutherland was returning to America.

Mary drove out to the airdrome with him and bid him farewell with a mixture of relief and regret.

She'd known him for less than two months but those had been crowded months. For all that she had never felt that Mark had a genuine measure of her liking, she was deeply grateful to him. She had many reasons for being grateful: Mark had made it possible for her to find a niche in the world that she wanted; he had made her introduction to Paris a gay and unforgettable one. When he left, she knew she would miss him, would find time for the thoughts that she had been able to crowd out of her mind.

They'd done everything there was to do in Paris, at least the things that it was possible for two young, gay companions. They'd seen the revues, dined in famous and in out-of-way places. They'd danced at the Embassy, the Lido and the Ermitage Muscovite. They'd gone to the Moulin Rouge and Bal Tabarin. She'd seen Mark play polo at the beautiful field at the Saint Cloud Country club; and screeched herself hoarse at his side the night they went to Wonderland to see the boxing matches.

Together they'd been swimming in the incredibly beautiful pool at Claridge's, watched Pelote at Montrouge beyond the Porte d'Orleans.

He'd bought books for her at the stalls that lined the Seine, presented her with quaint bouquets bought from the bright-eyed old ladies who added so much color to those ambling adventures.

He'd given a party for Mary and Kate and Ellin.

Yes, she would miss him. But she was relieved that he was departing, for these were days and nights when it took all the energy she had to make order out of chaos in her new life.

Her days were humble ones, filled with the tasks abundant on her desire to prove of worth to Anetka; days that ended in fatigue — great that she had little spirit for doing the things she wished to do.

If, in what seemed like another life to her now, she had gone back to the studio apartment on the East river to spend her evenings dreaming happily of her future, it was a different kind of dreaming. Less practical and more heart-warming, the first had been. But the routine was the same.

Lying in the huge old-fashioned bed with sketches and notebook beside her at the end of the days during that first September, she didn't dream; she planned.

And during those days, let us look at her. Mary Barrett with the copper curls, less cared for, brushed away from her face and pinned neatly to keep them out of her eyes. Her eyes are often harassed. There is so much to do. Trying to accomplish three things at once. Anetka wants her tea made, a scone toasted. The tinkling bell announces that someone is on her way up the narrow stairs. Gabrielle cannot be trusted to see that the gas is turned off under the iron on the stove which waits for Mary to press the orchid organza with loving strokes.

Anxious to please. And more importantly, anxious to accomplish much. Eager hands skillfully plying a needle with the tiniest of stitches; snatching a precious sketch before it is lost under a bolt of fabric, wielding a dust brush carefully over the cluttering objects in the "showroom."

Feet in sensible shoes taking hurried steps from workroom to front room, running errands to find a piece of lace, a bit of fur.

That was Mary Barrett at the end of September when Mark Sutherland flew to London and thence sailed to America—Mark, to whom she owed more than she knew.

But it was a changed Mary Barrett you would have seen in Anetka's shop by the end of November. It was a changed shop, said that was Mary's doing.

There was the same furniture, covered now neatly with tere de ningre and turquoise slip covers. No longer were there hassocks to trip over, dusty bolts of fabrics to be moved. The glass over the photographs shone cleanly in the light. The mirrored wall was polished. Deep yellow silk lampshades cast a golden, flattering glow over the room.

And at the now tidy and business-like desk in the corner, Mary Barrett, in a black silk apron, bends over an account book, wets the point of her pencil with her tongue, and grins satisfactorily.

For an instant she frowns, trying to remember which of the three seamstresses has been assigned to Mrs. Hartman's beige jersey. She makes a quick decision to tell M. du Lac that unless he gives her a professional discount, Anetka will no longer purchase her twill from him. And she really must scold Anetka; she shouldn't have tried to sell that shade of green to the jaundiced Mrs. Poole. Mary regretted running off at tea time the day before. When she wasn't there Anetka was sure to make some stupid error, like charging so little for the blouse that would have brought at least 300 francs.

"Fleur! Mademoiselle!"

Mary looked up from her accounts, followed Gabrielle into the workroom. Mrs. Hartman's beige jersey was ready for her inspection. She turned it inside out studied the finish on the seams gave it back to Madeleine with instructions to remove a pucker.

The bell tinkled, was followed by Anetka's welcoming voice. Busy with scrutiny of a piece of lace which had arrived a few minutes before, Mary paid no heed. In a moment she sighed, and put it on the table, slipped off her apron, patted her hair.

Anetka's voice called to her:

"Cherie! Marie! Come please. Madame Alleong wishes to consult with you!"

She picked up her large sketch pad and soft pencil, parted the curtains and saw with a proprietory eye that at last she had trained the maid to dust properly.

"How do you do, Mrs. Alling . . . This is the daughter you promised to bring to us? . . . But, of course, she is quite right! She should wear pink with her lovely Titian hair! Now, I think something Grecian . . ." She pricked up her sketch pad, sketched lightly, quickly. "Something not sophisticated for such a young girl, but something ageless."

While her pencil moved over the page, she studied the faces of her audience and turned to the girl.

"You like it?"

Janice loved it. Her mother liked it. Mary saw at once.

In tulle, perhaps?

"First fitting Wednesday." Mary said and made it sound like the conferring of a favor. "The price will be 1,500 francs . . . No, I'm afraid we can't finish it in less than a fortnight."

Mrs. Poole smile as she bent over her appointment book, knowing the expense that Anetka couldn't hide. She must teach her not to look so startled when she mentions prices beyond her wildest dreams, or when she said they couldn't finish it in less than a fortnight when Anetka knew they could do it in three days. She must teach Anetka a little psychology.

In one month it was no longer untrue that they couldn't fill orders in less than two weeks.

Two days before Christmas, Anetka said, "Marie, I have a most wonderful surprise for you! I am going to make you my partner!"
